Evidences of Progress.

Turkey has been generally regarded as a failing State-dropping to pieces from its own weight and the gradual decay of its vitality; and such, certainly had been the course of events during the century previous to 1830. Since that time efforts have been made by its rulers and leading men to arrest this downward tendency by the reformation of abuses, and the assimilation of its military and financial system to the more advanced model required by the state of the world large. Indeed, the first step in this direction, and bloody one had been taken some time before in the destruction of the celebrated corps of Janizaries, sort of Pretorian guards, who, from having been the most zealous and efficient servants of the Empire, had become its terror and curse. It is more than probable that Sultan Mahmoud, the predecessor of Abdui Medjid, the present ruler, attempted to carry forward his changes and reformations too rapidly, and without sufficient regard to the existing state of the country, and the deeply-rooted prejudices of the people. At any weakened, rather than strengthened. The old system already grown comparatively worthless, had received a fatal blow, while the new one had not yet had time to adapt itself to the people. The result was a general man for the defence. at naught the authority of the Sultan, and the central structure of the Sultan, and the sultan structure of the Sultan, and the central structure of the Sultan tral power, menaced on all hands, and receiving clock P. The results of the contest with Russia, so far, at least, go to show that the Turkish army of to-day facts elicited during the trial is very different from that whipped by Deibitch in 1829, or even by Abrahim Pacha, Mahomet Ali's General, in 1840. Instead of a loose rabble, it is an efficient army-more so, indeed, than even its best friends had calculated on. The spirit of the nation, too, is evidently different; it is more united, more devoted to the common cause, and the support of the Sultan. Its resources, as evinced by the arma- wife.
